Description

Pen, ink, white gouache highlights on paperH. 115 mm; W. 85 mmThis charming drawing depicts a concert of angels. The angel on the left plays an instrument similar to a Lira da braccio, a stringed instrument of the violin family, whose origins probably date back to the medieval period. It became very popular in Europe during the Renaissance, particularly in northern Italy. The Lira rests on the angel's knee, while his right hand holds a bow. The figure on the right holds a flute in both hands. Angels, like mythological figures such as Orpheus and Apollo, were for a long time the only figures depicted as musicians in Western art. This type of iconography, depicting one or more musician angels seated on staircases, is frequently found in works depicting Virgins in Majesty. In his compositions, a Virgin
