Kobell. His versatile talent was quickly recognized, so much so that he obtained a position at the Royal Porcelain Manufactory in 1822. He mainly painted serene and peaceful natural scenes, to which he gave a unique style through perfect and meticulous execution. He particularly enjoyed spending his time in the Bavarian, Swiss, and Tyrolean Alps, which inspired a series of highly regarded paintings. In addition to his own compositions, he made numerous copies of famous paintings in the Pinakothek on plates, platters, and vases. Among his most important works are a magnificent vase decorated with depictions of all the arms of the Bavarian army, a gift from Crown Prince Maximilian to the Sultan, as well as a painting depicting various views of Munich and its surroundings, presented to King Otto upon his departure for Greece. In 1843, he left for Italy. However, he was unable to artistically exploit the multitude of sketches he produced there, as he succumbed to severe pneumonia on July 9, 1846.
