Description

Pair of children. Polychrome pine wood. 18th century. Pair of polychrome pine wood sculptures depicting two children playing a wind instrument, both seated with their hands towards their faces, and slightly raising one leg to give some movement to a posture that might otherwise be too static. Given their postures and attitudes, they must have been part of a large, quality altarpiece, judging by the carving, details, hair, proportions, etc. It is noteworthy that the angels present do not have wings and are called in this case "putti" and are, in the same way, figures commonly found in religious circles although derived from Renaissance classicism and its sources in Antiquity. The proportions of the sculptures, the anatomy, the symmetry, the certain plasticity of the hair, etc. are elements that testify to a
