competitor to Sèvres. When Locré died, the head of the workshop, Laurent Russinger, became the owner. He ran the company until the end of the 18th century, when he joined forces with François Pouyat, a kaolin merchant from Limoges, due to financial difficulties. Pouyat worked to develop the company's activities until 1810, when he sold it to his three sons, who continued to run it successfully until the Restoration. Pouyat and Russinger specialised in good quality everyday items, mainly crockery and ornaments but also biscuit groups. Condition report: minor wear and slight hairline at the bottom of the stock.
