1935 after three years of study. He served in the French army during World War II. After the war, he won a prize from the French Minister of Fine Arts and exhibited his work in the best galleries in Paris. His father called him back to take care of the family business, and he practically abandoned drawing, which he did not resume until 1948.

Marcel Masson began his career as a set designer for theater and cinema. He was then advised by Vlaminck when he began easel painting. The walls of Montmartre and the suburbs were his favorite subjects, in a style reminiscent of the works of the Japanese artist Oguiss. The Marie Wild gallery hung it on its walls. At the 1958 salon, he exhibited three paintings: Rue des Norvins sous la neige, Mairie du Vieux-Montmartre and Devant l'église Saint-Pierre. In order to attract an American clientele, he adopted a lighter palette and painted scenes of Paris in the 1900s. Many of the subjects and scenes he painted came from a collection of images of Parisian streets from the late 19th century. He adopted a pseudonym and signed himself "Antoine Blanchard" while randomly leafing through the phone book; he then embarked on a frantic production of quality canvases, in a style depicting Paris during the Belle Époque influenced by the art of Eugène Galien-Laloue. His success was instant and would not wane. The paintings signed with his pseudonym enjoy a high rating, compared to the more intimate paintings signed with his real name. He died at the age of 78. Acquisition of five paintings by Marcel Masson by the Paris City Hall. Marcel Masson was exhibited at La Galerie Marie WILD, at the Salon des Indépendants (of which he was a member), but also at the Salon d'Hiver, the Populist salons, and at the Nationale des Beaux Arts. 1979 - Café de la Paix in Paris 1988 - Antoine Blanchard exhibition in Chicago on Paris during the Belle Époque, Wally Findlay gallery, publication of an illustrated brochure of 23 works in color.
