engraver, Lucien Adrion is renowned for his depictions of the countryside, French beaches, and scenes of Parisian life. Born in Strasbourg, he began his career as a fashion illustrator before traveling across Europe. During World War I, he found himself in Berlin, where he studied under the engraver Hermann Struck. After the war, he returned to France and eventually settled in Paris. He participated in his first major exhibition at the Salon des Indépendants in 1926. Supported by galleries and a few collectors, he devoted himself entirely to painting, creating canvases filled with light and life, with a preference for street scenes, racecourses, and the beaches of Normandy or the French Riviera. In 1926, with Paul Signac, he organized an exhibition of French painters in Berlin as part of the "Berliner Sezession." He subsequently exhibited in Berlin, Paris, and Los Angeles. A retrospective exhibition was dedicated to him by the Museums of the City of Strasbourg in July 1955.
