Description

A finely crafted 19th-century porcelain perfume bottle, attributed to Royal Worcester, c. 1870. The surface is entirely covered in hand-applied flower encrustation, with each individual bloom modelled and attached by hand. This labor-intensive technique, often referred to as forget-me-not encrustation, is associated with Worcester's most elaborate decorative work of the Victorian period.

The encrustation features dense clusters of small blue-tipped flowers with yellow centers, arranged to create a richly textured floral surface. The original stopper is preserved, with additional applied decoration and a finely gilded collar.

Such items are extremely fragile, and complete examples are seldom found in the current market. This piece combines technical refinement, visual charm, and high collectability. It also represents the intersection of Victorian taste and the 19th-century fascination with scent-related luxury objects.

Condition and Dimensions

Height: 12 cm

Diameter: 7.3 cm

Weight: approx. 250 g

The rim of the neck has been reattached (visible repair), several flower petals are chipped, and three fine hairline cracks are visible at the base. Despite these flaws, the overall appearance remains visually intact and highly decorative.
