Description

This small bronze representing the head of Bacchus or Silenus was cast using the lost wax method and gilded with mercury. It was probably intended to adorn a parade staff or a prestigious object. Examination of the hollow base shows us a handcrafted thread. The gilding, although very thick, is very worn, indicating extensive handling, which supports the hypothesis of the cane; indeed, at the end of a staff, its weight would make it a defensive weapon, moreover the threading system is too important to simply fix a small accessory, on a piece of furniture or any other decorative object. The quality of the cast, its state of preservation and its iconography make it a rare and precious piece. Height 6cm. Worn gilding, nose flattened by a shock, magnificent brown patina with green traces of oxide. Probably
