is 20 when he participates at the Paris Salon in 1901. Artistically, Alonso-Pérez followed in his father's footsteps by painting light-hearted genre scenes that were based on eighteenth-century models. Pérez also painted contemporary life in Paris, often using a blend of late nineteenth century settings and fashionable costumes from an earlier period. Pérez also designed tapestry models for Neyret Frères et Cie of St. Etienne in the Rhone Valley region. Pérez was an engraver, creating lithographs such as the Bal époque Louis XV now in the Louvre's collection, and prints for publication in a variety of art journals. He dies in 1914 at age 33. European and American art collectors at that time were fascinated with nineteenth-century evocations of eighteenth-century genre paintings. That trend called "the rococo revival" will eventually lead to the development of art nouveau in the 1880s.
