rather than detail.

In the foreground, two female figures wrapped in heavy clothing walk along the snow-covered road, adding a narrative and human touch to the alpine landscape. The work is characterized by a pictorial language reminiscent of impressionist solutions, with particular attention to the interplay of light, color, and mountain architecture.

The painting stands as a pictorial testimony of life in the Dolomite villages in the first half of the 20th century, where nature and rural architecture coexist in harmony. The choice of oil on panel highlights the artist's intention to give material compactness to the scene, with quick, impasto brushstrokes that enhance the freshness of the snowy landscape.
