studied in Paris at the Penninghen School after a varied academic career in the South West, then worked in advertising, notably at Publicis, before fully embracing his artistic vocation. Beginning of his artistic career At the same time, he worked in various jobs, sometimes as a night watchman, while drawing tirelessly until decisive encounters - notably with Michel Kellermann and the gallery owner Caroline Corre - allowed him to exhibit in galleries. Full recognition From the end of the 1980s, he devoted himself entirely to his art, between solo exhibitions (Paris, Brussels, Geneva, several cities in France) and distinction in the art world. Settling in Brittany In 2015, he settled in the small village of Plessix-Balisson in Brittany, and drew new inspiration from the specific light of the Emerald Coast. Favorite materials Dry pastel, colored pencils, charcoal, graphite, black stone... so many materials that he combines with subtlety, gradually extending from paper to canvas around the year 2000 (sometimes enriched with collages) Crabit paints the intimate: familiar interiors, folds of an abandoned sheet, suspended light of a morning, small everyday objects. His work, without characters, suggests a silent presence. "I like to highlight things that no one notices". His works often evoke "stolen moments" and "Breton escapes", with a touch of gentle nostalgia. Poetic atmosphere The exhibitions he held in Brittany often had evocative titles: The poetry of everyday life, The atmospheres of François Crabit... they are an opportunity to highlight the dreamlike, delicate character of his painting.
