Description

This zoomorphic mask, known as "Soko Mutu" ("the chimpanzee-man"), illustrates the great creativity of Hemba sculptors. Carved from very light wood (58gr), it presents a powerful and expressive model: a wide prognathic jaw, marked brow ridges, a half-open mouth suggesting an expression that is both threatening and parodic. The dark, cracked patina testifies to long ritual use and repeated manipulation. The Soko Mutu occupies a central place in initiation ceremonies and dances linked to secret societies, particularly within male associations. Representing the chimpanzee - an animal considered an ambiguous double of man - this mask embodied brute force, the transgression of social rules and the necessary domestication of primary instincts. Through his theatrical appearances, he reminded the initiated
