Description

Pair of Empire period stools Painted beech wood, recently redone upholstery covered with a fabric from the house of Lelievre, original straps. Early 19th century. These two stools rest on turned legs called Jacob, in reference to the famous dynasty of Parisian cabinetmakers and carpenters, active during the Consulate and the Empire. Their robust and elegant silhouette, characterized by slightly curved baluster legs finished with small connecting dice, illustrates the formal rigor and neoclassical inspiration specific to the Empire style. The frame is made of beech wood, a material commonly used for its solidity and ease of painting or gilding. The slightly worn patina reveals the traces of time, giving the whole a particular authenticity. The seats have been reupholstered with a contemporary, sober and geometric fabric, offering a discreet contrast with the refined simplicity of the structure. This type of seat, both functional and decorative, found its place in living rooms, boudoirs, or bedrooms, often as a complement to more monumental furniture. They perfectly embody the spirit of the First Empire: a taste for architectural discipline, the evocation of Antiquity, and the search for comfort adapted to everyday life.
