Description

Oil on wood by the Swiss artist Jan Balet title: In Normandy signature lower right and on the back "Balet" Very beautiful snow landscape expressed by a monochrome palette in a style tinged with serenity Pure landscapes are quite rare in the work of the artist who has long been the champion of urban landscapes and genre scenes. Born in Bremen in 1913, descendant of a Valais family that became Dutch, he spent his childhood with his grandparents on the shores of Lake Constance in Langenargen. His grandfather was a prison director. After an apprenticeship as a house painter, he went to the Fine Arts schools in Berlin and Munich. From this academic period, he only has two paintings left, the rest were destroyed. Hitler comes to power, Jan Balet must join the ranks of the army. He is 25 years old. "I became aware of the future of Germany. For me, Nazism was not a sufficient reason to die. I deserted." He settled in New York for twenty-seven years, married an American woman, and became the father of a child: "I am an American citizen. He worked as a graphic designer in magazines, rubbing shoulders with Henry Miller and Tennessee Williams. In 1965, he returned to Munich before starting again. Balet returned to the north of France, settled in the suburbs of Paris, and took up lithography. This, for printing reasons, took him to Switzerland. He decided to settle on the shores of Lake Neuchâtel and extended his art to painting. Is he a naive painter? "I am naive, only with the women in my life." Although he prefers not to categorize his paintings, he nevertheless places them in the "sophisticated primitive art" section because he is a "borderline case of naivety." When you walk through his three studios, the largest devoted to acrylic painting, the smallest to sketches and drawings, the third to photography and engraving, you realize that it is difficult to reduce his work to naive painting. Perhaps because it exudes too corrosive a humor. His paintings speak of human tragedy, they deal with the feeling of love - "because of the fiasco of my marriages." They refer to art, to Greek mythology, to the Bible that his grandmother often read to him at the beginning of the century, his "favorite era." His figures like to take the path of the outdoors, avoid the narrowness of buildings, settle in parks. Stylized, they represent social types, most often petit bourgeois. His themes evoke strolling, travel, and journeying. Little known in French-speaking Switzerland despite his international renown, the painter settled permanently in Switzerland but regularly exhibited in major American museums. A retrospective exhibition at the Bulle Art Museum was dedicated to him in 1998. He died in Estavayer-le-Lac in 2009, leaving a prolific body of work in European, American, and Japanese collections.
