illustrator. Gifted for drawing, he nevertheless did not dare to apply to the École des Beaux-Arts. From 1900, his drawings began to be published in the press. He settled in Montmartre and married Léona Ondernard in February 1914, before leaving for the front; he was discharged the following year. During the Great War, he designed patriotic posters and postcards, which earned him, during the Second World War, under German occupation, a place under house arrest. However, he illustrated six postcards intended for the sons and daughters of legionnaires. Reference required. Very attached to Montmartre life, Poulbot joined, in 1920-1921, in the creation of the "République de Montmartre" with his friends Adolphe Willette, Jean-Louis Forain, Raoul Guérin and Maurice Neumont. He was alongside them a member of the Cornet goguette. In 1923, to help the needy children of Montmartre, he opened Les P'tits Poulbots, a dispensary on rue Lepic, transformed into an association under the 1901 law in 1939 and which still exists today. The neologism "poulbot" was created in reference to his numerous illustrations representing Parisian street kids. Artist very highly rated on Artprice.
