Description

Chinese black and gold lacquer cabinet dating from the late 19th century, during the Qing Dynasty. Its two main doors, decorated with rectangular panels with oval medallions, present richly detailed scenes of life. The compositions show figures dressed in traditional attire, evolving in bucolic landscapes, embellished with pavilions, lush vegetation, and emblematic architectural elements. The gilded details, created with a refined lacquer technique, are magnificently framed by stylized floral motifs. The sides of the cabinet extend this decorative richness, adorned with detailed narrative scenes that add an immersive dimension to the whole. This piece of furniture rests on feet carved in the shape of lion claws, a symbol of strength and protection in Chinese culture. By opening the two main doors, the cabinet reveals a sumptuously decorated interior, where each element contributes to the artistic coherence of the whole. The interior door panels are decorated with gilded naturalistic scenes depicting birds perched on flowering branches. These depictions, executed with remarkable meticulousness, symbolize peace and harmony, values central to Chinese culture. The interior houses several drawers of varying sizes, also decorated with gilded floral and botanical motifs. These decorations are distinguished by their finesse, with each branch and flower appearing to have been carefully traced. The drawer handles, made of carved ivory, add an additional touch of refinement, although one of them is missing, highlighting the passage of time.
