Description

A charming statuette depicting a black and white Cavalier King Charles Spaniel standing on its hind legs. The coat is rendered with great finesse, and the dog's expression is remarkably expressive. Marked on the reverse with two interlocking blue Cs. Founded in 1735 in Moselle, the Niderviller earthenware factory became known from its inception for its production of fine pottery, as well as for its figurines, tableware, and polychrome porcelain art objects. During the 19th century, it also turned to the production of utilitarian tableware in feldspathic earthenware, for which it received an award at the 1855 Universal Exhibition. After expansion during the 20th century, which saw the creation of several subsidiaries, the company gradually declined. Today, many pieces created
