officers and personnel. When the combatants entrench themselves in the trenches, a veritable sniper war breaks out on both sides. In April 1915, the artillery services, in conjunction with the infantry command, studied a telescopic sight for precision shooting. Two APX-type scope models were developed in 1916 and 1917. The reticle consists of two lines forming a cross. The rifles are not modified; the scopes are mounted on the left side to allow for reloading. Information and other photos available upon request.
