Description

These two antique Chinese silk panels, presented in wooden frames, likely date from the late Qing dynasty (18th-19th centuries). They testify to the high level achieved by Chinese textile art during this period. Hand-embroidered on delicate silk, they depict narrative scenes inspired by scholarly life, blending elegant figures, pavilions, mountains, flowers, and symbolic elements of the traditional landscape. The embroidery technique reveals great mastery: polychrome silk threads, fine and regular stitches, balanced composition, and a keen eye for detail. The colors, now subtly patinated by time, retain a remarkable softness and harmony. These works, both decorative and cultural, illustrate the search for harmony between humankind and nature, a central concept in classical Chinese thought. Framed for their
