assembled the largest collection of autographs ever gathered from the Napoleonic era, which he supplemented with historical objects and souvenirs of the Empire. The majority of his collection was dispersed during three sales in 1934 and 1935 at the Hôtel Drouot, and after some difficulties with the National Archives of France, a fourth auction was organized in 1937 in London. A significant portion of his collection was exhibited at the Musée Napoléon in Digne; it was in this town, a symbol of the "Flight of the Eagle" during the Hundred Days, that the collector created a museum where objects evoking memories of Napoleon and the imperial family were displayed to the public. Inaugurated in July 1932, the Digne Museum closed its doors in 1939. While the majority of the collection remained in the Brouwet family, some objects were deposited around the same time at the Army Museum in Brussels, where they appear to still be kept today.
