Description

An important painting depicts an infantryman from the First World War, wearing the old military uniform used during the Franco-Prussian War of 1870, which was heavily criticized.

Indeed, our soldier wears the infamous madder-red trousers; these blood-red trousers caused the deaths of thousands of soldiers, so conspicuous on the battlefield that our enemies could not miss them. He is wearing a Model 1884 kepi with a madder-red turban and a blue band. His uniform is completed by a large Model 1877 greatcoat in a "bluish iron-grey" color. After much deliberation, this uniform was abandoned by a decision made by the Minister of War, Adolphe Marie Messiny, on July 27, 1914, just one day before the start of the war. It would be at least the end of 1915 before this uniform
