Description

This small oak writing desk, crafted in the Louis XIII style, dates from the mid-19th century. Its noble appearance and the joinery typical of Second Empire historical reinterpretations are truly captivating. The rectangular top is framed by a corbel carved with geometric figures. It rests on a frieze decorated with lozenges, each adorned with a small flower at its center. The corners are also carved with crosses accompanied by engraved flowers. The table features a wide drawer with a pendant-style metal handle. The four twisted legs, turned in spirals, perfectly embody the Louis XIII aesthetic, combining robustness with sculptural elegance. These legs are connected by an H-shaped stretcher, composed of turned and carved finials and crossbars, which reinforce stability while
