Description

An English Staffordshire pearlware jug dating to circa 1790-1800, produced in a compact size with rounded body, fluted neck and carefully shaped pouring spout. Small examples of this type are considerably less common than larger jugs.

The body is moulded with cabbage-leaf relief panels outlined in brown enamel feathering, applied by hand with serrated edges. The panels are decorated with loosely painted floral sprigs in polychrome enamels. The rim carries a modest foliate relief border picked out in blue and green enamels, uneven in execution and typical of early Staffordshire pearlware.

The pearlware body has a pale bluish-white tone. The base is unmarked. Comparable examples have been tentatively attributed to the well-known Staffordshire makers William
