Description

At the beginning of the 18th century, China and Japan still held a monopoly on porcelain production. Japan, however, was entering a period of isolation, and to meet the constant demand for Imari porcelain, Chinese kilns began copying its designs. The East India Company imported these pieces, adorned with exquisite floral and foliage motifs highlighted in gold, for the luxurious tables of the court and aristocracy. These early 18th-century productions would soon face competition from European manufacturers, who, under the patronage of the monarchs, would vie with one another in creativity. Here are three typical pieces from this production. One has a slight, old crack and some very minor chips; otherwise, it is in good condition, with no wear to the colors. It is easy to add to a set by purchasing
