Description

Charcoal and graphite on cream paper. The study of Alcibiades, the emblematic figure of Raphael's School of Athens, became one of the most frequently used anatomy and composition exercises in the classrooms of the Royal Academy of Fine Arts of San Fernando in the 19th century. This model, taken from the Vatican fresco, was fundamental for students to master the balance and posture of the foreshortened human figure, as well as the elegance of the classical profile embodied by the Greek warrior. The academic drawing of this subject was not a mere slavish copy, but a rite of passage in which the student had to translate the freshness of Raphael's brushstrokes into the precision of charcoal or sanguine, seeking to capture that blend of martial virility and intellectual
