Description

A charming turned boxwood mortar, accompanied by its original pestle, probably dating from the 17th or 18th century. The mortar has a beautiful flared shape, punctuated by several finely turned circular moldings. The dense and durable boxwood has a warm, deep patina, attesting to its long and authentic use. The interior shows signs of use consistent with its domestic or medicinal purpose. The pestle, also made of boxwood, is well-proportioned and maintains a pleasing harmony of form with the mortar. The set displays a beautiful uniformity of color and wear.
