the École des Beaux-Arts in Paris in 1968, where, as a student of Étienne-Martin from 1972 to 1978, she mastered modeling and the secrets of molding. In Cardot's workshop, she trained in stonework, and with Perrin in metalwork. She exhibited for the first time in 1974 at the Salon des Artistes Indépendants in Paris. She subsequently accumulated awards and exhibited almost every year in France, as well as in the United States, Germany, and Switzerland, both individually and in group shows, notably in 1988 in Chicago in a duo exhibition at the Jacques Baruch Gallery with photographer Lucien Clergue and painter Sacha Chimkevitch. Drawing on Rodin's gesture and mastery, Marie-Jo Bourron worked with a freedom and modernity of expression that gave her work a unique character. She was a complete artist. Tackling traditional materials like bronze and marble, she renews her repertoire by using original plaster casts which she patinates, poured or molded resins, other composites, and finally, clay. This last material is her preferred medium. Marie-Jo Bourron draws direct inspiration from Camille Claudel. Like Claudel, she is one of the few women to sculpt, and also pursues her quest for realism. Marie-Jo imbues her nudes with a similar touch, carefully working on her poses and patinas. She brings a bold new dimension to them.
