Bernard Picart was also of seminal importance for his artistic development. The prominent Dutch collector Cornelis Ploos van Amstel (1726-1798) considered Dubourg among the foremost artists of his time, ranking him alongside Isaac de Moucheron, Jacob de Wit and Cornelis Troost.¹ Dubourg specialised in the most noble genre of history painting, taking episodes from the Scriptures and ancient mythology as his subjects. He studied the human physique in many red chalk academy nudes, some of which are preserved in the Rijksmuseum, Amsterdam. This practice is clearly reflected in the present drawing, the subject of which allowed Dubourg to display his skill in depicting the male anatomy. The present charming drawing depicts Diana, Goddess of Hunters, identified by her emblem the crescent moon in her head-dress, attended by Nymphs. It can for instance be compared to Dubourg's drawing of Mercury and Argus in the Rijksmuseum, Amsterdam.²¹ M. van Berge-Gerbaud (a.o.), *Hartstochtelijk verzameld.
