Description

The head was molded. It is made of terracotta covered with a finely crackled, amber-colored lead glaze. It is a fine copy in the Tang Dynasty Chinese style. The craftsmanship is good, with hand-modeling that has left fingerprints, a thick glaze with fine cracks, and a beautiful color. The head is not cut; it must have been made separately, like the other parts of a horse, and then assembled and glued with plaster, traces of which can be seen underneath. Tang-style copies were created from the late 19th century onward, but they were crude. However, in the 1960s, Parisian forgers produced high-quality fake Chinese ceramics. It is likely that this head was made during this period rather than in 1900.

Dimensions: 455 x 390 x 150 mm.
