Description

Warm colors, the luminous and intense blues of a sky dominating a landscape rich in color and contrast, where dark, solemn pines overlook a road that cuts through the painting and bursts forth at full speed, lending rhythm and movement to this oil on canvas by one of the most important Provençal artists of the 20th century, Auguste Chabaud. The imposing work, executed in oil on canvas with a rich and unusual medium for this artist, is presented in a modern black frame measuring 85 cm x 122 cm, while the canvas itself measures 64 cm x 100 cm. It depicts a road in the Alpilles landscape; on the right, the black bark of a withered almond tree contrasts with the white rocks of the Montagnette, a place dear to the artist. An ochre road bursts forth and runs off to the left towards the round, welcoming olive trees of a small building, of which only the roof is visible. In good condition, with only a small, old restoration on the back, it is signed in the lower right corner. A large-scale work, luminous, colorful, and energetic. Auguste Chabaud entered the Avignon School of Fine Arts in 1896, where he studied under Pierre Grivolos. Then, in 1899, he went to Paris to continue his studies at the Académie Julian and the École des Beaux-Arts, in the studio of Fernand Cormon (1845-1924). There he met Henri Matisse and André Derain. His parents' vineyard suffered during the 1900 economic crisis, forcing Auguste Chabaud to return to the South of France. In 1901, to earn a living, Auguste Chabaud had to leave Paris and signed on as a pilot on a ship, discovering the West African coast. That same year, his father died; he and his brother inherited the vineyard and the land, which only his brother would manage. During this period, Chabaud worked extensively on butcher's paper. From 1903 to 1906, he served in the military in Tunisia, returning with sketchbooks filled with local scenes, including numerous drawings of soldiers, indigenous people, and bar scenes populated by women and sailors. Back in Paris, Chabaud made his debut in 1907 at the Salon des Indépendants, exhibiting alongside the Fauves. He discovered a new life: Parisian nightlife and cabarets. Collectors began to take an interest in his work. In Montmartre, where he had his studio, he painted the bustling and deserted streets and squares, scenes of nightlife, and brothels. In 1911, he began his Cubist period, working on large canvases and sculpting. Numerous exhibitions followed, including one in New York in 1913 where he exhibited alongside Henri Matisse, André Derain, Maurice de Vlaminck, and Pablo Picasso, and later in Chicago and Boston. His Fauvist paintings depict Parisian nightlife: cabarets, café-theaters, prostitutes, rendered in vibrant colors (yellow, red) contrasting with the colors of the night (navy blue, black). Upon his return from the First World War in 1919, Auguste

Chabaud settled permanently in Graveson, in the Alpilles mountains. From 1920 onward, he began his Blue Period (using pure Prussian blue) in which Provence, its people, and its customs took center stage. The South, which he had never ceased to paint, even during his time in Paris, would henceforth occupy his entire life. Like Paul Cézanne with Mont Sainte-Victoire, Auguste Chabaud immortalized "the small mountain," painting rural scenes of peasants traversing the hills and paths of the Alpilles. He remained there until the end of his life, living a secluded life in his home with his wife and seven children.

Nicknamed the "Hermit of Graveson," he died in 1955. Some of his works can be seen in Marseille at the Cantini Museum, in Paris at the National Museum of Modern Art and the Museum of Modern Art of the City of Paris, and in Geneva at the Petit Palais. In 1992, the PACA Regional Council opened a museum in his honor in Graveson. Painters regularly pay tribute to him, such as Claude Viallat in 2003. Auguste Chabaud wrote poems and books such as: L'Estocade de vérité, Le Tambour Gautier, and Je me suis pris pour Démosthène.
