He belonged to that golden generation of the Austrian capital who grew up amidst the cultural dynamism of the late Austro-Hungarian Empire. Throughout his life, despite his travels, he remained deeply attached to his region, becoming one of the most beloved painters of the Austrian landscape. He received a solid dual education: first technical training at the Vienna Graphic Institute (which explains his precision), then artistic training at the prestigious Academy of Fine Arts. Quickly integrated into the official art world, he became a member of the renowned Vienna Künstlerhaus in 1928. While he painted in oils, it was with gouache that he truly shone. This technique allowed him to achieve matte colors, modern flat tints, and great spontaneity. His work is a celebration of light. He eschewed superfluous details to focus on visual emotion and the vibrancy of tones. He is one of the great interpreters of Austrian villages and landscapes, which he treated with a joyful modernity. His Orientalist interlude, marked by his fascination with the light of the Orient, led him to paint souks, ports, and white architecture with the eye of a pure colorist, far removed from clichés.
