Description

The shape of this compote dish, which appeared around 1752 in Sèvres, is typical of the 18th century. Most often made of porcelain, this type of piece was used to serve all kinds of fruit, generally cooked into compotes, as if candying them. The compote dish also accompanied bowls and ice cream services, thus contributing to the refined presentation of sweet dishes on aristocratic tables. This compote dish is shell-shaped, with a scalloped rim. The base is decorated with openwork motifs evoking shells. The whole rests on a slight foot. Hard-paste porcelain. White ground with polychrome decoration, featuring in the center a circular medallion surrounded by a gold border, depicting a stag pursued by hunting dogs in a bucolic landscape. The rim is decorated with a series of
