This seascape by Nikolai Dubovskoi (1859-1918), a major figure among the Wanderers (Peredvizhniki), testifies to his role in the evolution of Russian landscape painting towards a more atmospheric and introspective approach. A renowned painter during his lifetime, he was one of the few Russian landscape artists to receive numerous awards at international exhibitions in Paris, Munich, and Rome; his works are now held in major institutions such as the Tretyakov Gallery and the Russian Museum, as well as in numerous museums in Russia and abroad.

The composition, structured by a low horizon, gives prominence to the sky and the effects of weather. With a supple and vibrant brushstroke, rich in texture, Dubovskoi constructs the sea in broad masses, prioritizing the sensation of movement and light over descriptive precision. This primacy of values and atmosphere places his work beyond strict realism, leading to a more sensitive vision of the landscape.

Secondary elements--rocks or boats--serve primarily to establish scale and reinforce the impression of immensity. The result is an image that is both dynamic and serene, where nature becomes a space for contemplation, conveying an inner experience of the world rather than mere observation.
