Description

The model can be identified as "Stag and Doe at Lodge" (E99), recorded in Bradshaw, with dimensions corresponding closely to the published measurements. The size confirms an early production example.

The modelling shows the typical early Derby character, with expressive yet simple forms, softly applied enamels, and a densely worked bocage. The underside retains a rough finish with a vent hole and visible patch marks, consistent with early manufacturing practice.
