Description

A refined Japanese incense burner in patinated bronze, depicting a stylised crane, dating from the Meiji period, late 19th century. The piece stands out for the quality of its casting and for its colourful cloisonné decoration applied to the wings and tail, combining turquoise, green, blue and ochre tones in floral and stylised patterns typical of export pieces. The hollow body, accessible through a discreet opening at the back, was designed to hold incense or solid perfume, making this object both functional and decorative. Its dimensions (24.5 cm high, 23 cm long and 8 cm wide) give it a perfectly balanced presence: large enough to make an impact, yet compact enough to fit effortlessly into a wide range of interiors, whether on a console, shelf or desk. Very good overall condition, with a consistent antique patina. The interior shows signs of use consistent with its function, enhancing the authenticity and charm of the piece. Gallery's view This piece perfectly illustrates the dialogue between Japanese tradition and Western taste at the end of the 19th century. The elegant, elongated silhouette of the crane, a symbol of longevity and grace in Japan, is here interpreted with a decorative freedom that feels almost graphic. The contrast between the sobriety of the bronze and the richness of the cloisonné creates a particularly harmonious balance. Thanks to its ideal scale and refined presence, it is a decorative object that is both accessible and distinctive, able to integrate naturally into an interior.
