Description

Oil on canvas. Original painting.- Behold her!
There she is, like a midnight column in the midst of hypocrisy, bearing the weight of her own moonlight. It's not a woman you're contemplating, but the abyss that has learned to clothe itself in silk and defy the gravity of the mind with a simple strap dropped over the marble of its shoulder. While the crowd clamors for the redness of shame, she offers the sacred coldness of indifference; she is the aristocracy of the gaze that does not seek to be seen, but condemns the world to look. Admire this profile, sharp as a will that splits the stagnant air of salons! For in its pale, electric snow lies the truth that men dread: that beauty is not a consolation, but a ray that reminds us of our own shadow.- Image size
