on a neutral surface, from which red and white carnations emerge, arranged with a soft and natural flow. The flowers are rendered with thick, visible brushstrokes, built through layers of color that shape the volumes without relying on a strongly defined drawing.
The palette is restrained, centered on warm, earthy tones in the background, which help isolate the subject and enhance the material presence of the flowers. The light is diffuse and lateral, without strong contrasts, gently guiding the viewer's reading of the composition.
