Description

The Intercom telephone by AB L.M. Ericsson, model HA 100/15 with the RE 6000 handset, is a striking example of early 20th century engineering and design. This model belongs to the so-called "self-dialing" wall telephones - automatic single-line devices with a galvanic ringer. Thanks to its self-dialing mechanism, this model eliminated the need for operator assistance and manual switchboard connections, significantly speeding up and simplifying communication between subscribers. Special attention was given to craftsmanship: the case was made of walnut, and all hardware and metal components underwent rigorous quality control. Such a device was not only a means of communication but also a symbol of its owner's status. Today, surviving examples of these
