Description

Porcelain plate Famille Rose XVIIIe - Compagnie des Indes, dragon and pagoda Chinese porcelain plate from the XVIIIe century, decorated in the so-called "Famille Rose" style, depicting a dragon evolving in a landscape embellished with a pagoda. The "Famille Rose" designates a type of decoration that appeared under the Qing dynasty around 1720, characterized by the use of enamels in soft, refined tones, dominated by delicate pinks. This palette owes its development in particular to the research of chemist Andreas Cassius, whose work led to the development of pigments based on colloidal gold. The dragon, imperial symbol par excellence in China, embodies power, prosperity and protection, while the pagoda evokes spiritual elevation and harmony. This piece testifies to the
