Description

19th-century Napoleonic folk art, depicting a commemorative diorama (or "tomb" box) dedicated to Arthur Wellesley, Duke of Wellington, celebrating his victories at the end of the Peninsular War in 1814. The presence of the fleur-de-lys (top centre), mourning birds, "eternal flames" and cypress trees (symbols of mourning and immortality) suggests that this was a tribute piece created shortly after the end of the war, but before his final victory at Waterloo in 1815.

Designed as an altar, this commemorative box is above all symbolic of the Duke of Wellington's membership of English Freemasonry. The date "April 1814" is a crucial one; it marks the Battle of Toulouse and Napoleon's first abdication. A mixture of fruitwood (pear or boxwood) for the fine carvings and mahogany for the outer case,
