Description

Kohl vase - 18th dynasty, New Kingdom (1550-1307 BC) Large (8.2cm) Egyptian alabaster (calcite) kohl vase, of slightly flared cylindrical form resting on a flat base. The interior, hollowed out with a drill, retains concentric traces of manufacture visible beneath the polished surface. This type of vessel was designed to hold cosmetic substances or ointments. This vase is distinguished by its size, significantly larger than the majority of examples still visible today, standing 4-6cm high. Kohl occupied an important place in ancient Egyptian toiletry. Prepared from ground minerals, it was applied around the eyes for aesthetic as well as protective reasons. The Egyptians attributed to it medicinal virtues against eye irritations and an apotropaic function linked to eye protection. Small alabaster jars for
