came to the Eternal City to study. In particular, there are many iconographic and stylistic parallels with a specific iconographic tradition adopted by the Flemish artist Isaac de Moucheron (Amsterdam 1667-1744) during his stay in Rome. This is likely a real-life location, one of the many gardens that adorned the grand villas situated on the hills near Rome, although the type of vegetation and the setting might evoke the hilly areas near Florence. The work is a masterful example of how the artist uses architecture and landscape to create an illusion of depth, with a wide central avenue guiding the viewer's gaze toward a majestic palace with an imposing dome, typical of the Italian Renaissance or Baroque style. The painting is dominated by warm shades of brown, ochre, and dark green, which lend the scene a quiet, almost dreamlike and monumental atmosphere. For comparison, we can consider the painting 'View of the Gardens of a Palace with Elegant Figures in the Garden with Statues' by Isaac de Moucheron (Amsterdam 1667 - Amsterdam 1744), and now in the National Trust (Hartwell House Collection, Buckinghamshire) (<https://www.nationaltrustcollections.org.uk/object/1548023>). His favorite subjects included aristocratic parks with Baroque fountains, mythological statues, water terraces, and idealized Roman ruins, and for this reason he became a go-to artist for the great bourgeois families who commissioned him to depict the gardens of their important residences.
