Period : 16th century

Condition : En l'etat

Description

A pair of antique relief-carved oak panels, likely of Flemish origin and dating to the late 16th or early 17th century. Each rectangular panel is set within a dark-stained wood frame. The primary material is oak, displaying a dense grain and a dark, aged patina with visible surface wear, small losses, and historical woodworm tracks consistent with age. Both panels feature deep-relief carvings of figurative scenes. The left panel depicts several figures in classical or biblical military attire; one figure is shown with a raised sword, while others stand near a reclining figure on the ground. The background includes architectural elements resembling a fortified city and a stylized tree. The right panel displays two central figures in draped tunics, one leaning over the other, set against a landscape with a large, textured tree and further
