Description

This work, executed on paper, was made in Foxrock, near Dublin, Ireland, on December 18, 1916. It shows great sensitivity in the treatment of the model. It shows great sensitivity in the treatment of the model. The artist employs a free, nervous brushstroke, with a subtle palette blending browns, blacks and ochres, lifted by delicate rosy tones on the face. The hair, treated with broad brushstrokes, and the luminous contrasts of the white collar, bring a beautiful modernity to the composition. The Irish context of 1916 gives this work additional historical interest, the portrait's execution occurring during a major period in the history of Dublin and Ireland.
