Description

An elegant sculptural group in glazed porcelain, signed Meissen, dating from the early 19th century, representative of refined European craftsmanship in the late Rococo style. The scene depicts an aristocratic banquet set in a domestic interior: four elegantly dressed figures are gathered around a lavishly set table, while a standing gentleman pours a drink with a measured and ceremonious gesture. The other seated guests participate in the scene with lively and natural postures, creating a harmonious composition rich in narrative dynamism. The rendering of details is particularly noteworthy: the garments, embellished with delicate polychrome floral decorations and gilded trim, attest to great technical skill. The finely modeled faces express grace and lightness, while the accessories--such as the set table, the chairs, and the side table with bottles and tableware--contribute to an intimate and sophisticated atmosphere. The circular base, decorated with painted motifs and gilded borders, lends stability and completeness to the piece as a whole. On the bottom is the characteristic mark of crossed swords in blue underglaze, an indication of manufacture and authenticity, an element of particular interest to collectors and enthusiasts. A piece of great decorative charm, ideal for enriching a collection of antique porcelain or as a distinctive piece in a classic and elegant setting.
