Description

Large artist's easel from the late 19th to early 20th century. A distinctive feature of this model--both practical and aesthetic--is the storage compartment at its base, designed to hold the painter's supplies. Constructed from several types of wood--oak, beech, and a white wood that is difficult to identify due to its beautiful, uniform patina. The lower panel is fixed; a crank and locking mechanism allow the upper panel to be adjusted to accommodate a second painting in progress, offering two working heights. Two casters have been replaced diagonally--one at the front and one at the back--with wooden cleats. Four holes have been drilled symmetrically into the uprights at two different heights. The cord has been replaced, and wrought-iron bars have been added to the back. Last photo: view from the
