Jules Adler--moved to Paris and began exhibiting at the Salon des Artistes Français in 1910. There, he received a silver medal in 1914 and a gold medal in 1925. Jules René Hervé then divided his time between Paris and his hometown, where he painted--with a light, expert brushstroke, using small, vivid splashes against skillfully arranged grays and ochres--the humble and picturesque events, as well as portraits of his austere society with its monotonous and subdued existence - But Jules René Hervé was equally adept at capturing the lively atmosphere of Parisian life and its monuments, or the dancers in the Opera's foyer - Delicate sentiments emanate from his finely observed compositions - Appreciated by art lovers in France and abroad, Jules René Hervé devoted himself to his art throughout his life - Jules René Hervé is considered "the last of the Impressionists"violondingres.fr
