Description

Four academic studies of male nudes, in graphite, drawn from life. These nude drawings--known as "academies"--were part of the academic arts education as practiced in the 19th century. They were created using professional models posing in the studio on a platform. This type of exercise allowed students to study anatomy. For a future artist, drawing from a live model, along with drawing from plaster casts and ancient statues, formed the foundation of their artistic training...
