Description

These authentic warthog tusks from Mozambique, dating from 1966, offer a fascinating glimpse into the history of African hunting and safaris. These impressive natural specimens were collected during the golden age of African safaris and remain highly sought after by collectors of natural history, hunting trophies, and ethnographic artifacts. The tusks feature the characteristic curved shape and robust structure that make warthog ivory so distinctive. Their elegant form and natural patina, developed over decades, contribute to their decorative appeal and historical value. Documented with their date and origin, these tusks offer a tangible link to mid-20th-century Mozambique and the traditions of big-game hunting expeditions in Africa. They can be displayed individually, mounted on
