He held the coveted position of royal globe maker for King Christian VII of Denmark. For this, he received an annual stipend of 500 livres. In return, he sent the king maps, books, and atlases every year. He was a bookseller and publisher and produced a significant collection of maps. He was often associated with the geographers Zannoni and Louis Brion de la Tour (1756-1823).His prolific output of published maps sometimes earned him, among detractors jealous of his fame, a poor reputation among other cartographers, who considered him unscrupulous and lacking discernment regarding what should or should not be published.
